If you're running Windows 7, you've just got a product key on a label on the side of your computer. If you have a Windows 10 PC, there is a special way to . The Windows 10 Upgrade Assistant keeps track of your Windows 10 product keys (including those used to upgrade from Windows 7, 8.1 and 8). A: If you install Windows 10, you'll get a message telling you that you have a product key. Assuming you have a valid license for Windows 10, just enter that key in the next activation screen. It's an issue with Microsoft. Microsoft is aware of it and is working to fix it. Q: Is it possible to build the "exact image" of a Haskell package using Cabal? It seems like Cabal can only build a partial image. Is there a way to get Cabal to build the exact package dependencies? We have a web project which uses the "http-client" package.

Unfortunately, "http-client" has a couple of dependencies that are part of base, but which aren't part of a standard installation. We were forced to build these on our server to make the package work. Is there any way I can make Cabal do the same thing? A: I think the normal way to do it would be to build the project with "--enable-shared" and check the build logs to see the output of "cabal install", the relevant part would look something like
