Windows 7 - 64 bit, 32 bit, Category:AutodeskIgE-mediated reactions and inhibition of mast cell mediator release. The skin is the largest mucosal organ in the body and forms an important first line of defense against invasion of the epithelia of the skin, which are lined with specialized plasma membrane receptors, the IgE-mediated receptors. The sensitization and provocation of the skin to a variety of allergens through contact with sensitizers leads to the release of a large number of chemical mediators, such as histamine, prostaglandin, leukotrienes, PAF and platelet activating factor. In the present article, I discuss the results of recent investigations on the biochemical events leading to the release of mediators from mast cells after the sensitization and provocation of the skin with an allergen. The results suggest that the sensitization of mast cells to an allergen may lead to a hypersensitivity reaction and that the release of mediators from mast cells involves a two-stage process in which the first stage is the binding of the allergen to the IgE molecules on the mast cell surface and the second is the mobilization of calcium from intracellular stores. The mobilization of calcium may lead to the secretion of mediators from the mast cells by activating a protein kinase which in turn activates a phosphatase. The phosphatase dephosphorylates phosphorylated mediator releasing proteins.

The resulting inactivation of these proteins may facilitate the release of mediators from the secretory granules of mast cells by a mechanism dependent on calmodulin./ Copyright (c) 2016-2018 David Boissier  Licensed under the
