There is a sentence in a novel: But my mother had been a monster in a cabin. I know a monster is a frightening creature. What does a monster in a cabin mean? A: The use of "monster" as a verb like "to be" has some pretty nasty connotations - in a horror movie context, it refers to something that is grotesquely out of place, like a machete in the museum. It has also come to refer to something that is frightening - think of a policeman who is threatening you. In your example, the reference is to an ugly little cabin of a house that was built as a place to entertain a group of wealthy people. It was probably an extremely secluded place where they could read and eat their food in peace and comfort. The whole concept was an anachronism (like a collection of swords in a museum), and that caused a lot of discomfort and even fear for all the inhabitants. Having said that, I actually quite like the phrase, and it makes me think of the MGM movie version of the Agatha Christie novel. The present invention relates to a device for the conversion of electrical energy, wherein the device includes a thermoelectric assembly arranged to be connected to an electrical load and a heat exchanger.
