Copper as a purification aid in the isolation of factor VIII concentrate. In this work we show that the addition of copper to a protein-detergent-salt mixture leads to a significant enhancement of the purification of factor VIII concentrate in the final step of the process. The possibility of using copper in place of nickel in the final chromatography step, an alternative approach to increasing the purity of factor VIII concentrate, is also explored. The metal is proposed to act as a ligand for protein-detergent complexes which then are removed by elution with the detergent. Addition of copper (20 mg/ml) to an Exocell Extracellular Immune Proteins product at pH 7, when compared to the same treatment of an aluminium-based ion-exchange resin, resulted in a five-fold increase in the purity of the product in the final step of the process. Under the conditions tested, the purity of the factor VIII concentrate was approximately 90%. Experiments were also performed to test the effect of addition of copper to a nickel-based ion-exchange resin. These showed that copper increased the chromatographic capacity of the resin. /3 (c) -1/5 (d) 5
