It followed losses to the Arizona Cardinals, New York Giants and Green Bay Packers. Those are three of the four worst teams in the league, and Dallas still managed to pull away from the pack. The thing about football, though, is that it’s not enough to have the right players. It takes the right line, too, and right now, the Cowboys have the worst line in the league. Since they began opening up the playbook, the line has remained a revolving door, and the Cowboys have been forced to play with even more pressure than they typically carry. They’ve been upended by some combination of pass rushers, linemen out of position, and linemen who have been victimized by the scheme. The Cowboys had the second-highest DVOA in the league (86.0) after Week 6. They’ve since dropped to 19.8, which is the 18th-best DVOA in the league. The line has been an epic disaster, and the unit’s performance directly impacts the performance of the team. The Cowboys haven’t been able to move the ball through the air, and they’ve been hit hard and then hit even harder because of the extra attention Dallas has received from opposing defenses. That Dallas is still winning games despite this suggests the team still has some very high-quality players in the mix. It’s their bad players, however, that are hurting the unit so badly. Dallas’ Good Defense Is Still Good Defense In the last six weeks, the Cowboys have ranked fifth in both yards and points allowed per drive. They’ve done this despite their slow starts and frequent deficits, because their defense has been a constant. The Cowboys haven’t changed their defense from when they’ve won, and that’s shown on the field. The Cowboys defense isn’t changing this season, either. They’ve used the same alignment for most of the season, with one or two exceptions. They’ve played primarily with their base 2d92ce491b
