Physical Training Improves Cardiovascular Tolerance in Patients with Non-Stable Angina Pectoris and Reversible Myocardial Ischemia: Role of the Autonomic Nervous System. The basic clinical data regarding the mechanisms underlying exercise-induced functional changes in non-ischemic myocardium in angina are still not sufficiently clear. We aimed at studying the contribution of the autonomic nervous system to the cardiovascular tolerance to physical load in patients with non-ischemic myocardial dysfunction. 20 patients with stable angina pectoris and reversible ischemia on myocardial scintigraphy were recruited to the study. Patients were randomized into two groups: G-I - 12 patients were examined on the condition of bicycle ergometry before and after vagolytic drug (tolterodine citrate), G-II - 8 patients were examined before and after physical load under the condition of neurohumoral blockade by intravenous infusion of propranolol. The bicycle ergometry test was performed on the condition of 30% of W_{max} , while heart rate, systolic blood pressure and double product were monitored. Cardiac autonomic modulation was assessed by time and frequency domain spectral analysis of the heart rate fluctuations. The scintigraphy with the use of dobutamine-atropine stress test was made before and after examination. G-II patients demonstrated a significant shortening of time to symptom development, an increase in time to a "decrease" of AMI-R/H ratio >10% and a significant decrease of double product. All these beneficial effects of physical training were abolished in G-II patients under the condition of neurohumoral blockade. The autonomic nervous system plays an important role in the mechanisms underlying exercise-induced changes in non 3e33713323
