Persistent and widespread environmental contamination by toxic metals in childhood can have significant adverse health effects, including neurologic and cardiovascular disease. The objectives of this study were to estimate the prevalence of clinical disease in children from a mining community with endemic lead and cadmium exposure and to examine the relationship between heavy metal exposure and clinical disease. Children (n = 471) were classified according to adult blood lead, cadmium, and thallium levels as being in the following quartiles: 90 microg/dL for lead and 1.80 mg/L for cadmium and thallium. Children were assessed for the following: motor and sensory impairment, learning disability, and clinical disease. The prevalence of impaired performance on all tests in the highest lead exposure quartile was 11.5% compared with 2.7% in the lowest exposure quartile (p = 0.02). There was no increase in the prevalence of clinical disease for any heavy metal exposure level. The highest exposure quartile for lead had the highest prevalence of learning disability compared with the lowest exposure quartile (p = 0.03). There were significant, positive correlations between blood lead and cadmium levels (p = 0.01) and between cadmium and thallium levels (p = 0.03). The findings indicate that blood lead, cadmium, and thallium levels are correlated in children from a polluted community. Lead levels did not appear to be associated with adverse health effects, while high cadmium and thallium levels were associated with learning disability.Q: Will my friends
