huge animal lover and I have a little pot bellied pig that I adore! I could never get him to sit like a normal pig when my family was visiting. He would just run around and look at me like I had three heads. So I came up with a project that had a little pig shape out of cork and attached it to a cushion! I figured it would look super cute and not so "piggy"! Steps 1. Get a roll of foam and get it hot in the oven (set the oven temp to the recommended temperature for your material. Like I said I used cork, but feel free to use whatever you have on hand. I also used this tutorial to set my oven temp).

2. Cut out a rectangular shape out of the foam. I cut mine out with a cookie cutter. I made two shapes because I wanted to cut out a pretty shape and a simple shape. I also wanted to make sure that I didn't have to cut out another shape if I decided it didn't look right! 3. Trace the end you will be painting on. Use the end that is shaped how you want your overall shape to look. This will be used for the back. 4. Trace the back as well as the sides so you have the correct size for how you will be painting your image. 5. Using a tape measure, cut out your image. I cut the image out with a paper cutter. Make sure to leave the edge long enough for you to attach it to the foam.

6. Using a normal glue gun, attach the image to the foam so that you have a nice, clean attachment.

I did download the whole program again from the website and it worked for me. Thanks. I do have Adobe Photoshop under my programs and it works just fine.

Â .Q: if `_crtOutBuffer` is `NULL`, why is the final character printed twice? I tried the example in my book. It prints out a string containing an asterisk character if `_crtOutBuffer` is `NULL`. However, it prints it out twice. I would think it should only print the final character once. #include #include int main(void) { char *str; if (_crtOutBuffer == NULL) { printf("%c ", *_poutptr++); } str = (_poutptr++); *str =

'*'; if (_crtOutBuffer != NULL)
_crtOutBuffer[strlen(_crtOutBuffer) + 1] =
'\0'; printf("%s ", _crtOutBuffer); return 0; }

A: Here is the specification for the C Library: 7.18.1.1.2 poutc (cdecl) This function is similar to the strcpy function in that it copies a C string to a memory block starting at a given address, and terminates the copy operation by appending `\0` to the end of the memory block. [...] If no `_poutptr` is supplied, `_poutptr` will contain the address of the first character of the standard C string.

5.2.4.2.2 The `scanf` function

[...] If a directive named ‘`%n`’ is used, the pointer passed as the new value for the location shall be treated as a pointer to a static buffer (as with `fscanf`) and the function shall read data into that buffer until the first null character is reached or a conversion specification is encountered. Since `_poutptr` is automatically set to the address of the first character of the string, that gets copied into `_crtOutBuffer` as well.

So when your program reaches the output
location for `_crtOutBuffer 3e33713323`
