Fatty acids inhibit the function of the Ca<sup>2+</sup>-ATPase in human platelets. The effect of fatty acids on the function of the Ca<sup>2+</sup>-pump in human platelets was investigated. Incubation of washed platelets with fatty acids at a concentration of 300 microM resulted in an inhibition of the transport of Ca<sup>2+</sup> in these cells and furthermore a decrease in the storage of Ca<sup>2+</sup> in the dense granules was demonstrated. This effect was restricted to saturated fatty acids, in particular palmitate (300-500 microM) inhibited the Ca<sup>2+</sup>-pump by 30%. Dichloroacetate, an activator of ATP-synthetase, or preincubation of the platelets with thrombin or thapsigargin to deplete the platelet dense granules, abolished the inhibition of the Ca<sup>2+</sup>-pump by palmitate. The inhibition of the Ca<sup>2+</sup>-ATPase by palmitate could be prevented by inhibition of protein synthesis with cycloheximide and by inhibition of phospholipase C by preincubation with the activator of protein

Font developers make fonts available in a variety of formats, including PostScript Type 1 (TYPE 1) and Windows Color Font (CID/TrueType) formats. A font is a collection of information about a specific set of characters. The information includes "coding planes" (the flat paper design, such as the serif, dot and other strokes on which letters are rendered), the measured height and width of the ink strokes used to print the characters, and the size (or font size) at which the font is to be used. A Type 1 font consists of these parts: PostScript font development A font family contains all of the Type 1 fonts (CID/TrueType) in a particular Type 1 format. Encoding A PostScript font encoding scheme assigns one or more PostScript fonts to print a letter on a particular piece of paper at a particular size. One font encoding scheme is required for each paper size that a printed letter is to appear. Encoding Descriptions A particular font encoding is assigned to many fonts because of the variations in the face of some fonts. For example, the euro sign may appear slightly different on different fonts. There are several encoding schemes in the TrueType family. Coding Planes A font is composed of many surfaces (called coding planes) in which a single letter appears. Different letters are formed by variations of the coding planes. Coding planes are defined in relation to specific points on the surface. Coding Plane Descriptions
