Getting to Know Photoshop Like any other application, Photoshop requires you to understand certain processes to be able to manipulate images. Some of these are very general in nature, but others, like specific tools and command buttons, are unique to Photoshop. Here we'll start out with some general information that you need to understand to use Photoshop, and then we'll dive into the specific features, features you should learn, and how to use and apply them in various projects.

- Learn the Process* You can't manipulate images in Photoshop unless you know and understand the processes of how the program works. Once you learn the basics, you can be sure that the commands you learn in the following sections will be easy to apply to new images that you create.
- Crop and Resize* The first two chapters of this book focus on the two most important processes to know about: how to crop your images and how to resize your images. While the crops are basic, the resizing is where you have the most control over the resulting image. 2. **

The Chechen Republic is a relatively poor and traditionally backwards region of southern Russia. This has been the case since the 19th century, when the Russian tsar government decided to centralise power in St Petersburg and in his efforts to rid the nation of any rival authority to his in the south. The centuries of isolation followed by the sudden move to nationhood, in a radically different society to that of the other subjects of the tsar, has meant that the minority of Chechens who have managed to escape this culture of poverty and backwardness have created a strong, viable ethnic group with their own government. Many Chechens have fled their homeland due to persecution and warfare and a huge amount of Chechen wealth has been lost in this struggle. This has created an economic division between those who have and those who have not. However, the division between the Chechen people has been reduced in recent years and the federation is currently one of the poorest regions of the Russian Federation. This is exacerbated by the poor economy, which has led to high unemployment in Chechnya and in other parts of Russia. One of the major problems faced by the Chechen republic is that their economy is largely based on the service industry, with its products and services, most of which are outsourced. There is a huge deficit in the supply of services, the Chechen infrastructure is poor and tourism is a low priority. The government of the republic began introducing reforms in 1996 in the hope of raising its economy and the standard of living for the Chechen people. These reforms include a number of decentralisations of taxation to encourage the growth of the market economy, simplification of administrative procedures and a reduction in the costs of the service and public sectors. However, few of these reforms have been carried out in Chechnya and all have been implemented in Russia on a national scale. Although the Chechen economy is extremely volatile

What's New In?

Millions of children are sick and dying. By one estimate, 3.5 billion children are stunted, meaning that they are growing at less than normal rates.

The World Health Organization has declared malnutrition a global epidemic. Scientists like to think of human fertility as a series of trade-offs—more body mass provides more calories and helps babies survive, but fewer calories means fewer calories for adults, and fewer calories means fewer calories for babies. For Mother Nature, then, there must be a point when mothers no longer seek to maximize their infant's survival: they start thinking instead about the survival of their children. By any measure, survival rates have been going down. Worldwide, the annual death rate for children under 5 years old dropped from 41.7 per 1,000 in 1950 to 15.3 in 2015. And it's getting worse: in 1998, the death rate fell by 19.5 percent; from 2000 to 2015, it fell by 17.3 percent. Put another way, a million children are dying each day, every day. The causes are many, but they include malnutrition, infectious diseases, and poverty. Many experts think that the western diet—rich in calories but low in nutrients—is killing children. Though data are limited, a few studies have shown that dietary deficiencies associated with grains, dairy, refined sugars, vegetable oils, and processed meats may be harming children's health. In April 2014, the United States Public Health Service issued a public statement saying that "an estimated 538,000 deaths occur among children under 5 years of age annually." The statement also noted that "children who are malnourished and stunted" are likely to die young from heart disease, kidney failure, and diabetes. It acknowledged that the "prevalence of stunting among children worldwide has declined, but the deaths and disease burden in children are still serious." We need to think differently about malnutrition—not just for the sake of our children, but for ourselves. There are several reasons why this malnutrition is going on, but the primary reason is that we as a society have decided to give health the lowest priority. Here are five key facts about malnutrition: • One billion people are malnourished and growing. Half of them are children. • Malnutrition affects the cognitive ability of the world's children. Those who are malnourished in utero or as young
